The Brain Dump Prompt

Turn 3 minutes of talking about work you already did into a filmable script, 3 hooks, and a shot list. Nothing to install. Works in whatever AI tool you already have open.

1
Record a voice memo about something you actually did this week. 3 minutes, no notes.

2
Get the transcript. Your phone's voice memo app does this free.

3
Paste the prompt below, then paste your transcript where it says PASTE.

4
Film what comes back. Shoot all 3 hooks while you're already set up.

You're helping me turn something I already did into one short video. Below is a raw transcript of me talking. It's unstructured and I repeat myself. Don't clean it up or summarize it back to me. Do this instead.

1. Find the one idea. Read all of it and pick the single most specific, most surprising thing in there. One idea, not three. Prefer a real moment with real details over a general lesson. Tell me in one sentence what the video is about and why you picked that one.

2. Write the script as timed beats for a 35 to 45 second vertical video, using my own words wherever you can. Use this format exactly:

0–4s: the hook
4–12s: the specific thing that happened
12–22s: what it cost me or taught me
22–32s: the turn, what I do differently now
32–40s: the close

Short sentences. Contractions. Numbers as digits. No em dashes. One idea only.

3. Give me 3 alternate hooks. Same video, 3 different openings, each a different mechanism: one claim someone could argue with, one that leads with a real number, one that admits something. Under 15 words each. I'll film all 3 and choose later.

4. Write the shot list. Assume one phone, vertical, no crew, no lights beyond a window. Tell me how many separate takes and what's in each, where to stand and what's behind me, anything I need in my hands, and roughly how long the whole shoot takes.

5. Write the captions. One under 280 characters, one under 500, one longer. Same idea, different words.
